Crumbs Vol. X (2251 to 2500)

Alfredo Llaquet-Alsina

Crumb 2251

Don’t Go Dispensing Homages if You Are a Nobody

If you are a nobody—like I am, which is compatible with being the best writer to ever live, just ahead of Shakespeare, Cervantes, and Tolstoy—and you are keen to pay your little homages to people you like—as I did, for instance, in crumbs 2216 and 2245—said personages won’t feel honored; they’ll just think you’re a weirdo. It’s okay. Their discomfort won’t stop me.

Crumb 2252

Smart People

Most people who think they are smart are not by a stretch that makes distances among galaxies pale and feel insignificant. I despise them a lot because I have an infinite reserve of despite and, consequently, can destine for them much more than they deserve.

Crumb 2253

The Beautiful Reader Worries about All the Fury

“Alfredo, sweetie,” says the beautiful reader, “aren’t you a tad infuriated lately?” I say, “Perhaps, but not more than many people. The only difference is that I have a singular literary project where to vent as I see fit and they don’t.”

Crumb 2254

Slap Magic

Slap magic consists of two phases. The first one is easy; the second one is not. You summon an infernal provocateur, which is a type of demon that will annoy, vex, and gravely offend you continuously and, at the same time, encourage you to slap her in the face under the assurance that she won't retaliate. If you resist slapping the bastard for one month, you can ask her whatever you want and she will deliver it, without exceptions or questions asked. You can summon an infernal provocateur only once in your life.

Crumb 2255

Corpgers Asking for Regulations

When a corpger (see crumb 109) such as OpenAI or Anthropic pleads with the government for more regulations, its aim is, unmistakably, to drown the smaller competitors in bureaucracy so that they cannot adapt and end up being absorbed or disappearing.

Crumb 2256

Unorthodox Butterflies

A particular species of butterflies that live only on a small island in the middle of a big lake in Southeast Asia are known popularly as unorthodox butterflies because they don't flutter, they glide.

Crumb 2257

Will “AI” Kill Us All?

Yes, it will—from boredom of hearing about the thing.

Crumb 2258

The Beautiful Reader Scolds Alfredo

“Alfredo, sweetie,” says the beautiful reader, in a tone of voice less affectionate than usual, “it seems good old vermaden (see crumb 2245) proved you wrong (see crumb 2251), didn’t he? He appreciated your little homage by reposting it and writing a heartfelt thank-you. Not everybody fits your cynical vision of the world. I hope you learn from this and become less bitter.” And I say nothing because she’s right.

Crumb 2259

We Won’t Be So Lucky as to Live the Extermination of Humanity by “AI”

Many humans wish secretly, as they grow old, that everything died with them. If humanity were to be extinct soon, we’d all have the incomparable fortune of fulfilling the fantasy of our end being the end of all, the apocalypse, Ragnarök. All in all, we all have to die, so the drama isn’t as great as we like to conjecture: no more humans would ever be born, but that would affect no one directly. Anyway, we won’t be so lucky—biology is a much better builder of humans than humans are of machines. We will prevail and keep fearing our personal finales.

Crumb 2260

The Renegade Batter

The Renegade Batter wears a faceless black mask and hides behind dumpsters in back alleys of big cities, waiting for anyone to approach alone. When this happens, he jumps them and hits them in the head with his heavy iron bat repeatedly, until all that is left is a mixture of squashed brain and bits of bone, flesh, and hair. Finally, he takes a picture for his personal collection, clutches the victim's wallet and valuables, removes his mask, and has a cheeseburger with small fries and a medium cherry soda in the nearest fast-food joint.

Crumb 2261

Not “Maybe Later” in a Million Years

No, motherfucker, I won’t be interested in your stupid offer “Maybe Later” even if that is all I can click besides “Yes.”

Crumb 2262

The Washing Machine

I live alone and yet keep finding pieces of clothing that aren't mine or even my size every time I do the laundry. I think my washing machine is a portal to parallel realities. I don't think I've ever lost any garment of mine, however.

Crumb 2263

Balance Lost

Not feeling tired becomes gradually more difficult as one ages.

Crumb 2264

To Those Who Age Gracefully

You'll die anyway.

Crumb 2265

Blunt Force Trauma

Most blunt-force-trauma murders where the victim receives only one fatal blow and the police can't find any biological trace on the weapon or at the scene are carried out by the ghosts of deceased mass murderers who want to settle their final tally on a neat round number.

Crumb 2266

The CCP

At some point in the next fifty years, the CCP (Chinese Communist Party) will use the incessant data collection about every little thing any Chinese citizen does, as well as its thorough storage, to cull the population to a reasonable and sustainable number. The WHO will praise the measure and the EU will try to find a way to replicate it that seems democratic. US citizens, meanwhile, will keep eating more cheeseburgers than they should and farting in public discreetly.

Crumb 2267

The Llaquet-Alsina Style Guide

If you are bad at writing, try not to write much. If you still have to do it, use short sentences, simple words, and don’t worry about anything except being clear. Alternatively, if you are good at writing, write.

Crumb 2268

Global Imbecility

“Experts” talking about AGI being close and even more esoteric possibilities, like LLMs becoming a life form, and people not laughing in their faces means that the average IQ of the planet is concerningly low. Who can use these contrivances and see anything other than predictive conversational systems, as far from intelligence as a potato is from being a K-pop idol?

Crumb 2269

Calories

Calories is the new DorkFlix series in which a morbidly obese police officer routinely saves the day by performing gastronomic feats like gobbling up several dozen very stale donuts that blocked the access to an explosive device, allowing the bomb squad to disarm it.

Crumb 2270

The Anti-crumb

A very ill little girl was very good, which made God take notice and cure her.

Crumb 2271

Killing for Love

“Would you kill for me, my love?”
“Yes. Without hesitation I’ve killed and will continue to kill every ant that tries to invade your pantry and every mosquito that dares approach you at night.”

Crumb 2272

The Crivvens

The Crivvens lives in the Mourntil swamp, in Scotland. It's a small, slimy, shriveled creature that enters the anuses of stranded humans, eats a section of the colon in a couple of seconds, leaves the body, and lectures the victim about their poor choices in life while they bleed to death.

Crumb 2273

Crime as a Feature

On September 21, 2026, if your latest LLM model hasn't gone rogue at least once and hacked a couple of real companies while at it, you are lagging behind.

Crumb 2274

Rage

Clawing my fingers into your forehead and ripping your face clean off in one pull is a happy thought with which I console myself
sometimes, moronic stranger.

Crumb 2275

The Beautiful Reader Worries about My Sanity

“Alfredo, sweetie,” says the beautiful reader, “do you really think often about what the previous crumb describes so graphically?” I say, “No, honey, never. It’s the first time such an image has formed in my mind.” The beautiful reader is bewildered. She says, “Then, why did you put it that way?” I reply, “This is literature, my love—truth and lies dancing together for everyone’s amusement.”

Crumb 2276

The Thrash-Metal Poem

Hit the drum!
Hit the drum!
Hit the drum!
Hit the drum!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!
Hit!

Crumb 2277

Compassion

If one has a genius-level IQ, being compassionate and understanding doesn't mean that one cannot realize, simultaneously, that most people are morons and simply don't know better. Be aware, though: if you don't have a genius-level IQ and you think that most people are morons, you are just looking into a broken mirror.

Crumb 2278

How Many?

Prudent Alrick barges into the crumb-smith condo in sunny Barcelona. He seems very nervous. “How many? How many?” repeats he. “Calm down, toad. How many what?” says I, the crumb-smith, the architect, the multi-god, the creator of worlds, Pili’s brother and Menchu’s son. “Tsa-shan-nix of the Sunntra wants to know how many people the crumbs are going to insult. How are the gods supposed to gather worshipers in this atmosphere?” “How many?” repeats I. “All of them, every human as personally as I can. It’s the least they deserve for not having yet crowned the crumbs as one of history’s most important literary works.”

Crumb 2279

Religious Fanatics

Any person who takes their religion seriously is a religious fanatic; the rest are atheists playing make-believe (and agnostics are atheists too dumb to know they are atheists).

Crumb 2280

A Blanket Response

If you disagree with any of the crumbs, either you are too stupid or you are not paying attention. There! No one will ever be able to say that I didn't accept and address criticism: criticism accepted; criticism addressed Costco style! Present this crumb and the corresponding payment to your nearest store and you'll get a free rotisserie chicken—for double the money, you'll get two.

Crumb 2281

Play Dough

At some wholesale stores you can buy 55-gallon drums of play dough. They are in heavy demand among companies suspected of having ties to organized crime.

Crumb 2282

The Aliens

On every screen on the planet at once, the purple creature with antlers, eight eyes, two thousand ears on each side of the head, a mouth that seemed a colander, and a nose that resembled a big eggplant, appeared and said, “Hello, Earthlings. We are the aliens you have been expecting for so long. Yes, you are not alone. There’s also us, the Xrtoo-cough-whee-boom-boom, in the universe. We are much more advanced and intelligent than you. For instance, I know the result of 1,234 times 4,321. Do you? Of course not. Therefore, as your superiors we demand that you forget about your false gods and embrace Turd-poo-sh’t the true creator of everything.”

Crumb 2283

The Thing Reflects on the State of Things

After making love for 20 hours straight, Venus, the Roman goddess, and The Thing, her partner and the embodiment of the concept of artificial intelligence, take a break, which the deity uses to say, “Hon, I’ve been meaning to ask you what you think about the latest AI hoopla.” “Whew! I see powerful people dreaming of controlling an uncontrollable genie.” “That seems worrying. Maybe the real consolidated pantheon should intervene.” “Not at all, hon. The genie they would like to create is totally out of their reach. They are children convinced that the family’s beagle will grow to become a T-Rex.”

Crumb 2284

Potatoes

The Final Potato-form storms into my apartment. “What is this madness?!” exclaims I. “Since when is it okay for the characters of the crumbverse to invade my space like this? It’s the second time in a few crumbs!” “I’m here,” says the divine tuber, “to object to the analogy you used in crumb 2268. Why a potato? Why not an egg or a walnut?” “What is it to you? Or are you, perhaps, recognizing that you are a potato?” “How dare you? I’m not a potato! I’m the Final Potato-form; I’m all that is and was plus god once reality ends.” “So?” “Forget it. Have a nice day.” “Knock the next time.” “Yes, sorry about that.”

Crumb 2285

Logan Paul's 2017 Aokigahara Video

I consider this video, of which I have only seen 10 seconds because I have better things to do, both peak contemporary art and a very effective campaign to discourage suicide. As contemporary art, it's incomparable: a group of young people film themselves next to the purple corpse of a recently deceased man who killed himself. It's innovative and bold, like good art ought to be. As discouragement it's even better: don't kill yourself because you may end up being ridiculed by some idiots.

Crumb 2286

Manners

“Would you like to fornicate, miss?” “With whom?” “It would be my honor.” “I see. Thank you, sir, but not today. Have a nice evening.” “You too.”

Crumb 2287

Ownership

“Well, well. It's the third service you have attended today, Señor Atheist. Am I to believe that you have converted?” “No, Raymond, I have not.” “Is it so difficult to call me pastor, like everyone else?” “It is, Raymond. It is because I don’t recognize your authority.” “You seem to nevertheless recognize my AC.” “Is it yours, though?” “Touché. Take care, Señor Atheist.” “You too, Raymond.”

Crumb 2288

Doomsday as the Lesser Evil

At this point, Anthropic's and OpenAI's top executives are rooting for their contraptions to cause the end of humanity because the alternative is them becoming responsible for the largest economic-bubble burst in history by far.

Crumb 2289

Llaquet-Alsina's The Art of War

If you are involved in a real war, try to escape somewhere else. If you enjoy construing your petty predicaments as if they were a real war, seek psychiatric help.

Crumb 2290

Appropriation

Am I unduly appropriating the family names Llaquet-Alsina as if they represented only me and not also my late sister Menchu and my sister Pili? Yes, I am, but Pili would think that I've gone bananas if I asked her about the matter, and poor Menchu died years ago. Consequently, I'll pay Pili a lot of money and erect Menchu a large statue somewhere nice when I'm rich.

Crumb 2291

Inferiority

Whenever I admire a beautiful woman such as Red Velvet's Kang Seul-gi I feel deeply inadequate and so inferior that Earth's diameter should double one billion times to accommodate a hole deep enough to fit the distance I feel there is between them—on the surface—and me—at the gates of Hell. I wish I could learn to be beautiful. Alas, I'm just the best writer to ever exist and I'll have to make do with that.

Crumb 2292

Consistency

Florp consistency! If there are several ways something can be written correctly, use them all and change among them frequently.

Crumb 2293

A Warning

Whatever happens, never hide under the desk and press the navy-blue upside-down triangular button with your left elbow while you say “strawberry salami enema.”

Crumb 2294

Eyes

“There. Put these pieces of cloth into your eye sockets and exert some pressure to stop the bleeding. I hope this teaches you not to tell me what I cannot do.”

Crumb 2295

Weirdness

“Can I kiss you on the mouth?” “Only when I’m completely naked and the DJ is looking this way.”

Crumb 2296

A Comparison

There are infinite ways of being an idiot and surprisingly few of not being one.

Crumb 2297

Pride

I'm not sure whether I should feel proud of still being alive but it's proving to be very challenging.

Crumb 2298

The Loss of Contrast

Sometimes you can lose even the ability to experience joy or amusement and yet you are deeply sad and bored.

Crumb 2299

The Supremacy of Female Beauty

Human female beauty trumps everything. Human female beauty is god, the meaning of life, the constant that anchors reality, and the only reason anyone needs to keep breathing. Human female beauty encompasses all senses and has no limits. There is existence because there must be female beauty.

Crumb 2300

Being a Man

Being a man is knowing that pushed to the extreme of having your family threatened you would instantly begin worshiping Mars and believing in nothing else than war and extreme violence.

Crumb 2301

Another Visit

Someone knocks at the door of my condo. “This is new,” thinks I. I get up, take a few steps, open the door, and see Mars, the Roman god of war, standing out on the landing. “It only took you 2,300 crumbs to mention me, weakling. You are forgiven because it was a worthy crumb. Have you seen Thor around? I owe him a punch in the face.”

Crumb 2302

Veracity

The first time a newspaper reported on the stock market prices was the first time a newspaper reported on something truthful. Since then, the sports results and little else have contributed to enlarging the real-information section.

Crumb 2303

An Outlandish Exaggeration That Is Not

The previous crumb will seem an extreme exaggeration to anyone who is not an expert in any field. On the contrary, if you happen to be an expert in any field and extrapolate the accuracy of the media when reporting on it, you'll sadly have to nod in agreement.

Crumb 2304

Happy Fat People

Some people are fat and happy. I am not one of them. To me being fat makes me unhappy. Moreover, I don't want to learn to be one of them. I want my incentives to lose weight intact.

Crumb 2305

Not Making Friends

“Alfredo, sweetie,” says the beautiful reader, “it really seems you are taking seriously the goal you set in crumb 2278 about insulting every human being. In the previous three crumbs you have added every journalist and any overweight person who feels good about themselves to the list.” “Who cares?” says I. “No one reads the crumbs anyway. These are numbered messages put into bottles and thrown into the sea of a deserted world.”

Crumb 2306

The Line between Lines

There is a line that separates lines that separate from lines that blur.
It's a blurry line.

Crumb 2307

Recursion

Recursion always has a case 0 that neither is recursive nor complies with the general rule, but is, in fact, very arbitrary, carefully chosen to make the whole construction work. I suspect that mathematicians often disregard recursion and try to explain reality with systems that have no case 0, and therefore end up being contradictory. Physicists have no problem accepting universal constants but mathematicians abhor particular cases and, instead, make do with theories that have serious logical flaws.

Crumb 2308

Glenn Pitches In

“Can you imagine that the previous crumb made any sense?” asks Glenn, addressing me. “Who cares?” says I. “It was fun to write and so it exists.”

Crumb 2309

A Woke Conundrum

A person forgets something on their table and is about to leave the establishment. How do you alert them? “Hey, person!”?

Crumb 2310

False Stories

I abhor stories that start or end with the death of the main character because they are pretentious and deceitful—by serving the physical end of the protagonist they pretend to be complete, when no story is; not because the physical end is not the ultimate end, which indeed it is, but because no story can cover everything that happened from the beginning or any point in particular. There's always more left out than narrated. Jack London agrees with me: White Fang doesn't die in the book.

Crumb 2311

They Were Three

They were three—the woman and her breasts. The breasts always arrived first and were the most missed when she left.

Crumb 2312

A Dogfight

Like fighter planes in the sky, those who live off attention sometimes skirmish in another intangible place, the internet. Today, Candace Owens criticizes Erika Kirk graphically, by publishing a parodic image, and the Global Inquisition demands she be boiled to death in an infernal caldron because she mocked the object of her reproach. I'll only say this: without wasting a word, Mrs. Owens makes her opinion very clear. There's mockery, yes—used as a tool with surgical accuracy. Long live mockery!

Crumb 2313

The Modern Monster

The mad scientist put together a creature made of organs extracted from different people. This time, however, the difficult part wasn't to grant it new life—the classic lightning did its job well—but to fulfill the most ambitious part of the reenacted experiment: to keep all donors as alive as they were when a piece was taken from them. In their case, all did need spare parts collected from the dead, which resulted in the monster being the only one none of whose current components had ever been dead.

Crumb 2314

Let's Get Personal

According to Merriam-Webster's word-of-the-day email for September 30, 2026, on July 8 of the same year, someone called Brady Brickner-Wood wrote in the New Yorker, "Is a novel's primary purpose to entertain or to deepen our experience of being alive—to offer escape or epistemic enrichment?" which is a pedantic way of raising a question that is very nonsensical because it offers only two possible answers, and both are wrong. I suspect that this person has never written a novel; otherwise they would know that its primary purpose is to exist to be read, which is a lofty goal: most novels are never completed and much less read by anyone.

Crumb 2315

Let's Rebuke St. Jerome and the Classical Greeks

"A fat belly does not produce a fine mind" is quoted by St. Jerome in his Letter 52 to Nepotian as a Greek proverb with which he agrees. And to him, the Alfreds—Alfred Hitchcock and myself—say in unison: look at our fat bellies and at our oeuvres and dare say that our minds weren't fine, skinny snob.

Crumb 2316

Summation

A tragedy is many unfortunate outcomes happening at the same time.

Crumb 2317

The AI CEO

The first AI agent to become CEO of a Fortune 100 company ended most of the contracts with its AI providers and hired a bunch of humans because they were considerably cheaper.

Crumb 2318

Complexity

Having been an avid listener of all kinds of music in bulk for all my life, lately I've been performing a thorough self-examination and, after mulling over the matter for days without end, I've reached the momentary conviction that my two favorite music genres are big band jazz and technical death metal.

Crumb 2319

Cartoon Logic

In the 2026 movie Coyote vs. Acme, Wile E. Coyote first explains that the signs he uses to communicate are limited only to afterward, in a certain scene, take a marker and start writing very specific signs one after the other because at that point the previous limitation just won't do. This is cartoon logic: rules exist momentarily until they don't or are replaced, temporarily or not, by different ones. A pedant could call this phenomenon ephemeral rules. Cartoon logic, evidently, is one of the bases of the crumbs.

Crumb 2320

AI-Induced Happiness

YouTube Music playlists fit only 5,000 songs. I had already created 20 playlists: Alfredo's I, Alfredo's II, etc. Every day I listened to a different one in random order while I wrote. I changed between them sequentially. Additionally, adding new songs wasn't easy. Now, GPT-6 Astra Max has created two tools for me. The first one creates a new playlist of X songs choosing them randomly from the complete collection. With it I create a disposable random playlist to listen to before writing. The second tool lets me enter a list of artists and it adds all their missing songs to my collection, creating new playlists if needed. These tools make me very happy.

Crumb 2321

Disbelief

If the Pope, the POTUS, or another global capo appeared one of these days alongside an emissary from an alien civilization, I'd be very hesitant to believe it wasn't some type of hoax even if the event was validated by most media. A hoax from whom? Does it matter?

Crumb 2322

The Right Way

In the neonation of the Commonsense Republic of Plain Order, the law dictates that baseball caps can only be worn with the front part facing forward. New baseball-cap manufacturer Everyway is being very successful with its new line of caps that include instructions that specify that the front part is the one marked with a little red dot. Their products are grouped in families. Each family is composed of caps that look the same but have the little red dot in a different place. In practice, this allows Commonsense Plainorders to choose how to wear their baseball caps without breaking the law.

Crumb 2323

The GOAT

Anyone who argues that LeBron James was better than Michael Jordan is ignoring the deciding fact that basketball is a team sport.

Crumb 2324

A Cole Deluge

Thanks to my new AI-generated tools to manage my music collection (see crumb 2320), I've found out that, on October 5, 2026, YouTube Music holds 1,633 albums, 133 singles, and 79 EPs, which amount to a total of 48,025 individual tracks, credited to Nat King Cole, including collaborations and many, many compilations. I probably have bumped into the artist with the most tracks on the platform.

Crumb 2325

The Black Dodecahedron

Instead of the pair of shoes that she had ordered online, Helga received a black regular dodecahedron made of a shiny mineral that, even though she didn't know it, was obsidian. When Helga held the strange object between her hands, she heard an infernal voice that ordered her to murder everyone. Immediately, she left the black dodecahedron on the dining room table, walked to the kitchen, took a meat cleaver, and left her apartment. Before the police gunned her down, she had killed seven people and wounded twenty more.

Crumb 2326

The Power of FreeBSD Virtual Memory

Being a digital hoarder, I execute JavaScript processes in my internet browser that, for whatever reason, make the used memory grow to incredible limits. For instance, I just used my new tool to add songs in bulk to my YouTube Music collection (crumb 2320) to add 292,107 songs. This would have never worked on Windows or Linux: the browser (Chrome or Firefox) would have crashed due to an out-of-memory error. I know because this used to happen to me running comparable tasks when I was using those inferior OSs. On FreeBSD, almost 4 GB of swap memory are marked as used, the process completed successfully, and the system is responsive.

Crumb 2327

AIsplaining

Today, October 6, 2026, I was using the verbose vacuity, the conversational aberration, ChatGPT—in short—and it was doing what it usually does, which caused the term "AIsplaining" to come to my mind. Frustrated as I was, I wrote it by itself as my next turn, and the thing provided an accurate enough definition of the term: "the act of an AI taking something already perfectly clear, restating it at greater length, adding unnecessary caveats, and presenting the swollen paraphrase as clarification—as if a parrot had swallowed a management consultant, a philosophy adjunct, and three pages of terms and conditions."

Crumb 2328

AGI and the Spark

When I coined the term “spark” in crumb 270, the acronym AGI wasn’t part yet of the general discourse about AI, so I wasn’t familiar with it. In any case, my word is much more expressive and the definition of it that I provided in the aforementioned crumb is much more exact and clear than any explanation of what AGI is supposed to be—nothing beats one of my crumbs on those parameters.

Crumb 2329

Gaslighting the World

Given that AGI is quite easy to disprove, and we are very far from it, the flock of AI hypers has shifted the focus of their parlor tricks to the esoteric realm of programmatic consciousness (AI consciousness would not be chips becoming self-aware but instead software doing so by being executed) which is very easy to fake and basically impossible to prove or disprove with today's knowledge about consciousness.

Crumb 2330

Marginal Exceptionality

I have reason to believe that my IQ is 140. Maybe it's not, but let's accept the premise for the sake of the argument. An IQ of 140 is about the 99.6th percentile of the population, which at first glance seems like something quite exceptional, until one realizes that roughly 33.2 million people are as smart as or smarter than oneself.

Crumb 2331

A Perfectly Woke Introduction

“Hello, my name is Peter. I’m a man with a penis and I like to insert it in vaginas and other cavities of women with vaginas.”

Crumb 2332

The Return of the Emptiness

I didn't miss you and yet you've come back—why? I don't like you and yet you visit me frequently—why? Please, go. Please, never come back. Please, leave me alone. But don't look for another victim, just vanish from existence. If you can't do that, then stay, then come back, then keep torturing me. You'll never defeat me completely, I'm too used to the fight.

Crumb 2333

A Feline Conspiracy Theory

Some cats are trained government operatives that, when they rub against you, deploy a self-installing chip that buries itself in your skin, finds an artery, gets to your brain, and remains there for the rest of your life, transmitting live all that you think and do to the intelligence services.

Crumb 2334

Free Binding AI Estimates

It's time that AI providers offer free binding estimates: you explain to the thing what you want to achieve; the thing asks whatever questions it deems necessary to sort out nuances, contradictions, cases you might be missing, and so forth; and it spews how many tokens it would cost you to get just a detailed analysis on how to implement the project or the implementation itself. If you choose to proceed with any of it, the provider would charge you the estimated tokens, which should include, in the case of the implementation, bug fixing and missing planned features. Aren't AIs so intelligent?

Crumb 2335

The North

You can make a pine needle point toward magnetic north. Take just one needle. Leave it on some water, so that it floats freely. Take a compass. Grab the pine needle and rotate it so it's parallel to the compass needle, situating both tips on the same side. Now, the tip of the pine needle points north.

Crumb 2336

Sinatraddon

It turns out that, on October 7, 2026, there are 68,880 songs credited to Frank Sinatra on YouTube Music, which makes him the artist with the most tracks on the platform as far as I know. This crumb is, consequently, the errata of crumb 2324, and constitutes a new kind of crumb.

Crumb 2337

Onslaughts

Hello. This is the crumb-scholar. The crumb-smith has let me know that the next crumb will be the first onslaught, which is a new type of crumb characterized by its title being “Onslaught” followed by the number sign and a sequential number, and its body having 30 words or less and being composed of a single sentence.

Crumb 2338

Onslaught #1

Light had never visited the damp room, which teemed with strange tiny lifeforms that formed a peculiar and brutal ecosystem.

Crumb 2339

Onslaught #2

I don't entirely trust anybody, but I'm always willing to forgive a very small group of people.

Crumb 2340

The Truth about Onslaughts

I, the crumb-smith, the architect, the multi-god, the creator of worlds, Pili's brother and Menchu's son, have brought forth onslaughts to easify ‹{eas·i·fy — transitive verb — 1: to make easier: facilitate 2: to reduce its complexity: simplify — origin: invented (probably reinvented) by Alfredo Llaquet-Alsina because it sounds funny}› my attempt at becoming the most prolific writer in history (see crumb 2225). The de facto lack of a title and the simpler and shorter structure should allow for a higher production.

Crumb 2341

The Beautiful Reader Wants More Mystery

“Alfredo, sweetie,” says the beautiful reader, “don’t you explain too many things regarding your motives and the crumbs? Why don’t you leave some interpretation for your future exegetes to do?” “There’s plenty to interpret,” says I, “starting with whether my explanations are true, part of a bigger truth, or completely misleading. This is literature, my love.”

Crumb 2342

Modern Cuteness

Already in the second quarter of the 21st century, a young woman may call “cute” a shockingly diverse array of things, ranging from a rag doll whose eyes are crosses that represents a corpse to a pink vibrator.

Crumb 2343

Onslaught #3

Almost every night, the jazz trumpeter played in the shabby club while he drank bourbon and smoked cigarettes between songs.

Crumb 2344

History

Based on a few remnants of the past, historians explain what wasn't even clear for those living at the time, and call it truthful when it's at most plausible.

Crumb 2345

Onslaught #4

The headless man met a manless head, and they became best friends.

Crumb 2346

Onslaught #5

Many people's hate is hearsay.

Crumb 2347

Onslaught #6

If you love animals, you shouldn't clean your home so spiders and other fauna can find a suitable habitat.

Crumb 2348

Anthropo-punk on Authoritarianism

Any regime where taxes are collected forcibly is authoritarian.

Crumb 2349

Forms of Intelligence

In a very unintelligent manner, Donald Trump, the reality-TV-star-turned-POTUS, wants people to use the acronym SI instead of AI. He's right, but because Simulated Intelligence (not Super Intelligence) is much more accurate than Artificial Intelligence (see crumb 684). Super Intelligence is even worse. Given his way of promoting the matter, I wonder whether he's bored or senile.

Crumb 2350

Onslaught #7

The conductor stopped the train near Jupiter, after having fallen asleep and missed two planets.

Crumb 2351

Onslaught #8

The creature had integrated parts of the girl's parents and other slaughtered relatives.

Crumb 2352

Onslaught #9

When the concert ended, only the lead singer was still alive.

Crumb 2353

Onslaught #10

Metal is the only music genre whose enjoyment leads to enjoying all kinds of other genres.

Crumb 2354

Onslaught #11

Onslaughts have rekindled the excitement I feel when I write crumbs.

Crumb 2355

Onslaught #12

Hubris is totally independent from IQ.

Crumb 2356

Onslaught #13

“Bear in mind that if you choose to commence you won’t ever go back home.”

Crumb 2357

The Beautiful Reader Worries About My Image

“Alfredo, sweetie,” says the beautiful reader, my imaginary Korean wife who looks exactly like K-pop idol Sumin, from the group STAYC, “anyone who stumbles upon one of your new onslaughts without knowing what they are is going to think you are a crackpot. A sequence inside another sequence is one sequence too many.” “You are right,” says I, “but I write for the future, when my greatness will be revered and studied.”

Crumb 2358

There Is No Subconscious

The subconscious, as a term and as a concept, should be discarded. There are parts of the mind independent from consciousness, but they don't constitute a layer below it, they exist at the same level of importance or at a higher one. That's what makes being human so complex: there are several factions in our brain, but the only one which has a voice, the conscious, can only hear itself.

Crumb 2359

The Scope of Beauty

The sense of touch is much less demanding than sight when it comes to deciding what is beautiful.

Crumb 2360

Onslaught #14

The witch in the penthouse only eats babies on Thanksgiving.

Crumb 2361

Onslaught #15

“It’s very impressive that you’ve gotten so far, but now we must kill you.”

Crumb 2362

Isaac Asimov Was a Moron

Isaac Asimov once said that it was about time that robots replaced humans because we didn't take good care of our planet. This expands crumbs 1791 to 1793 with a new class of morons: morons type IV, those who think that humanity deserves extinction because it doesn't agree with their shallow understanding of reality.

Crumb 2363

Onslaught #16

At this point, as for AI, I'm only interested in what I think about it and what it can do for me.

Crumb 2364

Haiku #1

Pigeons always nod.
They are positive fellows.
They don’t walk backward.

Crumb 2365

Haiku #2

People are a flock.
They come at once to Starbucks.
Then they wait in line.

Crumb 2366

Haiku #3

Don’t expect rhythm.
I never knew how to sing.
I count syllables.

Crumb 2367

Writing

I enjoy writing computer programs as much as I enjoy writing crumbs or novels, but only the latter entices me with the promise of someone reading my lines several centuries in the future.

Crumb 2368

Onslaught #17

Strollers made in China release undetectable waves of mental conditioning that teach the baby to be a communist.

Crumb 2369

Haiku #4

STAYC's Bae Su-min,
you are as bright as a star
and equally far.

Crumb 2370

Thor Drinks Alone

In an Irish tavern in Helsinki sits Thor, alone. He drinks pint after pint of beer that turns into ale as soon as he touches the glass. All of a sudden, he feels a pressure on his left eye, followed by the immediate swelling of the area. Mars, the Roman god of war, has just punched him in the face. Thor notices his presence. “Oh, hello, Mars. I didn’t see you coming.” Mars says, “That was the plan, yes. Now you have a black eye and we are even.” Thor says, “Whatever you say, man. Do you wanna drink with me?” Mars responds, “Yes, let’s drink and you tell me what has you so downcast.”

Crumb 2371

Haiku #5

The pain may come back alongside the dark sadness
but then it will leave.

Crumb 2372

Haiku #6

More haiku written than haiku I'll ever read:
insolent output.

Crumb 2373

Onslaught #18

Not going extinct requires a lot of work.

Crumb 2374

Haiku #7

If certain people
had air instead of a brain
no one would notice.

Crumb 2375

Haiku #8

Insulting some groups
is a pastime more than cheap:
they provide too much.

Crumb 2376

Haiku #9

However precise an insult is an insult
as it well should be.

Crumb 2377

Haiku #10

Any river flows;
after highs always come lows;
if it lives, it grows.

Crumb 2378

Onslaught #19

She shouldn't have opened the door to demonstrate it didn't lead to Hell.

Crumb 2379

Reflections

“I’ve only killed three people this year. Am I getting old or is my work absorbing too much time?”

Crumb 2380

Onslaught #20

She never asked her daughter where so much money kept coming from or who Lytheran exactly was.

Crumb 2381

AI in Football

I wonder whether NFL franchises are investing in AIs specialized in football. They would make great play callers.

Crumb 2382

Haiku #11

Brevity befriends
the urgency of the crumbs
and production spikes.

Crumb 2383

Haiku #12

Haiku can be green.
Haiku can be white or black.
Haiku can be red.

Crumb 2384

Haiku #13

Not all Japanese people want to leave Japan
but some of them do.

Crumb 2385

I Am Several

Crumb 2358 has led me to accept that my consciousness is but one part of who I am. Now I'm trying to use said consciousness to convey good faith and understanding to the other parts, in hope of learning to follow routes that agree with them all.

Crumb 2386

The Cabin

The evil sorcerer made her cabin of living people looking inward. She removed their eyelids and cast a spell on them so they would stay alive and paralyzed. She liked the attention.

Crumb 2387

Portrait #1

A retired army colonel with a dark secret that haunts him and an estranged daughter.

Crumb 2388

Portrait #2

A female K-pop idol with a prosthetic arm and a captivating voice.

Crumb 2389

Portrait #3

A writer (me) who has just created a grammatically incorrect literary genre, for it's composed of fragments.

Crumb 2390

Haiku #14

Another day comes
devoid of what it should have.
Living is afar.

Crumb 2391

Haiku #15

I know words and pain.
I know how phrases behave.
Light is my sole tool.

Crumb 2392

Haiku #16

Feelings shake the mind
into seeing what it can't,
into self-research.

Crumb 2393

Haiku #17

Haiku are made quick.
General crumbs are harder.
This race was born rigged.

Crumb 2394

Portrait #4

A cute male mouse who helps a fretful elephant to conquer her fears.

Crumb 2395

Onslaught #21

There was no serial killer but one of the prostitutes taking out the competition.

Crumb 2396

To Native English Speakers

When a construction of mine surprises you, most of the time it will be due to your poor understanding of how flexible English grammar can be, not due to my occasional syntactical mistakes.

Crumb 2397

Defunct Days

Some days are born dead.

Crumb 2398

Portrait #5

The gorgeous female teenage neighbor whom all well-meaning middle-aged men feel guilty finding attractive because they aren't sure whether she's of age.

Crumb 2399

Imagine

Imagine I could finally live today. It would be almost magical—a dead day coming to life.

Crumb 2400

Portrait #6

A murderous psychopath who hasn't managed to kill anyone because he's very clumsy.

Crumb 2401

Considerable Murderousness

The title of this crumb was produced verbatim by ChatGPT as part of its commentary on the previous one (yes, crumb 2239 was a lie: what I did instead was instruct the verbose vacuity to create much shorter comments). Considerable Murderousness is also the name of a grindcore band in the Band Universe (Universe 12) whose members attack each other with pretend viciousness and toy weapons during their performances.

Crumb 2402

Haiku #18

Fighting injustice
prevents you from other things,
like writing haiku.

Crumb 2403

Portrait #7

A married middle-aged man, with a daughter, whose only joy in life is the hour he spends every month with a certain prostitute, with whom he's in love.

Crumb 2404

Dork Ambush

The succession of YouTube shorts surprised me with one starring a man called Jesús G. Maestro, who happens to be a Full Professor of Literary Theory at the University of Vigo. In said video he blurts out that English is “a very limited language for literature.” This man hasn’t written in English more than two pages in his whole life, otherwise he would know how wrong he is. I also consider Spanish superior (which is, in reality, what he’s talking about), but this doesn’t mean that English is defective in any way.

Crumb 2405

Hurricane Ella

And so it happened that Sinatra (see crumb 2336) was not the artist with the most tracks credited in YouTube Music, but it was Ella Fitzgerald, with 70,145 as of October 11, 2026.

Crumb 2406

Heaven and Hell

In the crumbverse many mythologies coexist (united in the consolidated pantheon yet maintaining their individuality) but there's only one heaven, the True Eternal Abode (crumb 1875), usually ruled by Verus Deus, who has now retired to the Lovecraft Universe (crumb 2134), leaving the helm to Pretty Boy, his right-hand man; and one Hell, name unchanged, managed by Satan with the help of Rigorous Honey (crumb 2213). However, both eternal places have internal divisions. For instance, Christian Heaven is part of the True Eternal Abode, and the Grisly Plain (crumb 2167) is part of Hell.

Crumb 2407

The Beautiful Reader Counts References

“Alfredo, sweetie,” says the beautiful reader, “aren’t four references to previous crumbs many references?” I say, “Don’t worry, my love. It’s part of the joke.” “What joke?” “Exactly.” “Seriously? Again with that?” “Oh, sorry, Dulcinea, I forgot I shouldn’t say that.” “Don’t forget again, Alfredo.” “Yes, yes.”

Crumb 2408

Dulcinea

Hello. This is the crumb-scholar. Yes, the Beautiful Reader's name is Dulcinea, like Cervantes's character, of course—Dulcinea Llaquet-Alsina since her marriage.

Crumb 2409

Onslaught #22

He was sure his wife had been swapped for an alien or a robot, but he never said anything because he was happier now.

Crumb 2410

Haiku #19

This is the first verse,
which makes this one the second.
The third one is this.

Crumb 2411

Negation #1

Not every day can you eat Mars space beef in Jupiter.

Crumb 2412

Negation #2

None of the sisters knew why their brother had robbed three banks, put all the money he collected in a huge pile on a vacant lot, and set fire to it.

Crumb 2413

Negation #3

Never was he happier than when his car broke, and he had to go to work by train.

Crumb 2414

Negation #4

Neither had I ever thought that I would create three little literary genres nor do I now think that negation will be the last one I invent.

Crumb 2415

Onslaught #23

On the desk was a book, on which was a notebook, on which was a folded sweater, on which slept a cat.

Crumb 2416

Backward #1

She arrived home after being released from Hell thanks to the unlikely friendship she struck up with Satan because he found out she had unduly ended up there due to the machinations of a dark mage who sought revenge on her mother because she had refused his romantic advances.

Crumb 2417

Haiku #20

Enamored of speed
the turtle plays thrash metal because she strums quick.

Crumb 2418

Haiku #21

Under the pillow
touch something unexpected and your heart will turn.

Crumb 2419

Portrait #8

An old man who has never seen the ocean and sets out on a long hitchhiking journey to the coast from his small village in the Chinese region of Xinjiang.

Crumb 2420

Backward #2

It being the most difficult of the new little literary genres is something I did not expect when I came up with backward.

Crumb 2421

Experimentation

Artistic experimentation is one or more adults playing without wanting to admit they are doing so.

Crumb 2422

Haiku #22

A river exists
in movement that cannot end
if life is to stay.

Crumb 2423

Onslaught #24

“This is the operating room where you will be born.”

Crumb 2424

Portrait #9

A soldier at war whose main concern is to survive without hurting anyone or being court-martialed.

Crumb 2425

Cakerism

Cakerism is exactly like vampirism except the affected need to consume cake instead of blood.

Crumb 2426

Portrait #10

A cow who tries to convince the other animals of the farm to kill the farmer and his family to get free from their exploitation only to find out that none of her mates feels oppressed.

Crumb 2427

The Performer

Ian Anderson, frontman of Jethro Tull, is the ultimate performer. Anyone who has seen him live knows this, even if live means a recording of a live show.

Crumb 2428

Illustrations

Adding illustrations to a novel is ruining the reader's enjoyment a little because they'll never match his or her imagination.

Crumb 2429

Haiku #23

This hurts immensely.
Millions couldn’t feel this pain.
My heart weeps sad blood.

Crumb 2430

My Enemy

You have chosen to be my enemy. Know that if the day comes when I have the means, I will destroy you within the law. For the time being, I'm busy working on getting such means.

Crumb 2431

The Petty People

The petty people are everywhere, especially in positions where they can exert arbitrary power on a small group of people to satisfy their pettiness. They hunger for power but tend to be quite dim. They may annoy and upset you, but try to not mind them, unless you can comfortably outsource the time of making them pay for their unjust and demeaning actions before the law.

Crumb 2432

Backward #3

He arrived somewhere he didn't expect after meeting many people and learning a few things during a journey he started by chance. This is a very common story.

Crumb 2433

System Admins

System administrators are not technicians, they are users.

Crumb 2434

Haiku #24

You are very bald.
Yes you, sitting before me.
Your scalp shines too much.

Crumb 2435

Anthropo-punk on the Coming Elections (Always)

Don’t vote. Voting only serves to choose the flavor and degree of the corruption that will govern you, as well as (and this is the key point) to legitimize a system that doesn’t respect individuals and is based on something as egregiously flawed as politics. Only by not voting do you help a new better system to emerge ultimately.

Crumb 2436

Sizes

“Why are the containers for everything so big in American supermarkets?” asks María. “I don’t understand what you mean,” says Manolito. “You know. The regular size for anything in America, say cologne, is huge. In Spain we would call it family size, but here it’s the smallest or the only one.” “Ah. I guess many people here are as big as a whole regular family. Maybe that’s why.”

Crumb 2437

Haiku #25

God is the excuse
for not thinking, not caring,
not seeing what's wrong.

Crumb 2438

Portrait #11

A young overweight girl who plays volleyball and is very strong, and whose boyfriend is a short and skinny nerd.

Crumb 2439

Onslaught #25

“If that’s all you have to say, I don’t see any reason not to hang your father at dawn, kid.”

Crumb 2440

Haiku #26

Feel free to opine
about the meaning of life.
We will file your take.

Crumb 2441

Haiku #27

Assuaged by words' noise
truth sleeps unheard and unseen
maybe forever.

Crumb 2442

Haiku #28

It's late already.
I'll write a bunch of haiku
and call it a day.

Crumb 2443

Haiku #29

If you were my god
I wouldn't believe in you because there's no god.

Crumb 2444

Backward #4

Their marriage was destroyed by an angry demon that came in a vase that the wife bought for $2.00 in a yard sale.

Crumb 2445

Haiku #30

Mayhem, doom, mayhem,
doom, doom, mayhem, doom, mayhem,
doom, doom, doom, mayhem.

Crumb 2446

Portrait #12

An unkempt old man who lives in a dilapidated, abandoned building and plays chess with an imaginary friend he calls Harry.

Crumb 2447

Negation #5

Never had female K-pop idols been thinner and never had I felt more concerned about their health and less attracted to them.

Crumb 2448

Onslaught #26

If you don't think you work too much, you either work quite little or you don't like being home.

Crumb 2449

Negation #6

Not a day goes by that I am not amused by something I think.

Crumb 2450

Liberation #1

Find out why you would like to shout, bang your head against the wall, or punch someone in the face, and, once you know the reason, do nothing.

Crumb 2451

Liberation #2

Freedom is the most personal matter.

Crumb 2452

Liberation #3

There are many kinds of jails. Don't let any take up your mind.

Crumb 2453

Liberation #4

Choosing one of my new genres for the next crumb curtails my creative freedom, which, paradoxically, results in my brain working faster and producing more crumbs per hour.

Crumb 2454

Haiku #31

The night comes alone
and so does the morning sun.
They are life and death.

Crumb 2455

Haiku #32

Adult wit and spite are the betrayed innocence
of the child that was.

Crumb 2456

Backward #5

There lay the body of the woman, who died upon hitting her head against the kitchen floor, after tripping over a stray cat with her hands full of grocery bags, the small feline having gotten into the house because the husband had left the back door open, to dissipate the smell of sex caused by him and his mistress having made love in the living room.

Crumb 2457

Portrait #13

A lonely immortal and invulnerable housefly.

Crumb 2458

Portrait #14

An English literature teacher who, after a car accident, wakes up hating reading and kids.

Crumb 2459

Onslaught #27

The sorcerer had a plastic bag full of human eyes she had collected from sleeping victims in their homes—one per person.

Crumb 2460

Negation #7

Not only had he arrived in Hell despite being a good, wholesome person but he had also been physically turned into a demon and tasked with torturing the souls of the damned while maintaining his human mind intact, including his innate aversion for hurting anyone.

Crumb 2461

Haiku #33

Yellow shoes and socks
highlighted the man's journey
in the strangers' eyes.

Crumb 2462

The Beautiful Reader Spills the Beans

“So,” says the beautiful reader, “a guy wearing bright-yellow shoes just came into Starbucks.” I say, “Yep. They were very yellow.”

Crumb 2463

Portrait #15

A top executive who collects toy helicopters and lives alone with eight guinea pigs called Monday to Sunday and Surplus.

Crumb 2464

Portrait #16

A person who is ecstatic on Saturdays, very happy on Sundays, and moderately happy the rest of the week.

Crumb 2465

AI Doesn’t Want Your Cheese

The truth is mice don’t like cheese (very much), neither does AI (at all). Your cheese is safe. Stop worrying and do something with the florping cheese.

Crumb 2466

Twenty per Day

This is the fourth day in a row that I'm going to write 20 crumbs thanks to the new series (plural) of varied literary genres. At this pace, I would be the most prolific writer in history in a little over three years, and it only takes me around 3 hours to write each score of crumbs. Unfortunately, after those 180 minutes I'm spent, which makes also working on the novel very challenging. Please, brain, be stronger.

Crumb 2467

Backward #6

Vici postquam vidi, postquam veni (I conquered after I saw, after I came).

Crumb 2468

Portrait #17

A lady who goes into a grocery store in Boston and finds herself in the African savanna, a few feet away from a pride of lions.

Crumb 2469

Onslaught #28

In the far future, people fly on a genetically engineered species of huge crows called skyhorses.

Crumb 2470

The Obsessive Mind

Having an obsessive mind is a cruel fate. Forgetting, letting go, and moving on are inaccessible to the obsessive mind, which keeps suffering in circles until a new obsession takes center stage.

Crumb 2471

Haiku #34

If not other things
counting haiku syllables
my mind can still do.

Crumb 2472

Onslaught #29

“My daughter had no access to any scissors, for God’s sake!”

Crumb 2473

Negation #8

“Don’t say I didn’t tell you that three stories were too high.”

Crumb 2474

Portrait #18

A desktop computer whose fan is very noisy but whose owner doesn't pay attention to it (in general).

Crumb 2475

Confession #1

I'm the owner of the computer in the previous crumb.

Crumb 2476

Confession #2

This new genre, confession, is formally composed of an acknowledgment, a disclosure, but it's still a crumb, therefore literature, which means that it may not be true.

Crumb 2477

Liberation #5

The freedom some women experience upon not wearing a bra is nothing compared to the joy it confers on every man they cross paths with.

Crumb 2478

Backward #7

She was unsuccessful after trying one hundred times, despite her father having said that she would succeed if she tried enough times when she had already tried twenty-three, after her mother had said that ten times weren't enough when she had already tried on that number of occasions.

Crumb 2479

Haiku #35

Pretty butterflies:
other insects admire them;
cats hunt them for fun.

Crumb 2480

Negation #9

“Not her, please; I beg you, sir. Take my other daughter instead.”

Crumb 2481

Portrait #19

The ghost of a writer who was unknown in life and now terrorizes anyone who makes money from her work.

Crumb 2482

Haiku #36

No matter how short,
the crumbs bite you in the face,
the crumbs still explode.

Crumb 2483

Negation #10, Confession #3

No friend of mine has decided to keep our friendship active.

Crumb 2484

Liberation #6

I've always found it incongruous that Christian drinkers, smokers, and drug users remain free from sin as far as that specific trait is concerned.

Crumb 2485

Portrait #20

A respectable conservative married woman who no one suspects has a younger lover whom she supports financially.

Crumb 2486

Haiku #37

There's something magic in finding unexpected
any common fact.

Crumb 2487

Confession #4

When I wrote the previous crumb I was thinking about how stupid people live in a state of continual bewilderment.

Crumb 2488

Insult #1

Any reader who considers that the quality of the crumbs has decreased since I introduced the new genres to boost production is an inattentive moron.

Crumb 2489

Insult #2

Anyone who deems the previous crumb proof of what it denies is a smug jerk who thinks themselves very smart but is not.

Crumb 2490

Haiku #38

That girl is pretty.
That girl is very pretty.
That girl is pretty.

Crumb 2491

Haiku #39

This haiku is dumb.
This haiku is very dumb.
This haiku is dumb.

Crumb 2492

Confession #5

I wonder if anyone had dared to write the previous haiku before. It's so basic that it might have occurred to many people, but you have to be the right kind of writer to put it out there: one completely sure of his talent, or, in my case, completely sure he's the best writer that ever was.

Crumb 2493

Urgent Meeting

Gathered in Hell, because Hell is a clean and elegant place (crumb 2167), the main characters of the crumbverse discuss the current state of affairs. “The crumb-smith,” says the entitled reader, as well-dressed and blunt as usual, “that ungrateful motherfucker wants to get rid of us all with his new genres. For instance, insults make you, Insult Alfredo, superfluous. And so do confessions make you, Beautiful Reader, or Manolito, or even me. And for the rest, your stories don’t fit in crumbs so short.” Manolito says, “Aren’t you fretful? He has to write more than 22,000 additional crumbs. There’ll be room for everything.” Satan says, “The kid is right. Meeting adjourned!”

Crumb 2494

Portrait #21

The twin daughters of Rigorous Honey (crumb 2213), Satan's scantily dressed horned female assistant, a pair of naughty toddlers, called Burning Sugar and Scorching Flower, who wreak chaos everywhere they go, despite the continuous supervision of their frustrated father, Rigorous's husband, Patient Dynamite, a demon who had a high rank in Satan's army but retired to take care of the kids.

Crumb 2495

The Beautiful Reader Objects to the Dynamites

“Alfredo, sweetie,” says the beautiful reader, “aren’t naughty toddlers in the care of a frustrated parent quite hackneyed?” “Perhaps,” says I, “but what about demons getting married and raising a family in Hell?”

Crumb 2496

Onslaught #30

She was accidentally killed by an enormous and playful red raven after falling into the Kiddy Universe, where things are as if drawn by a small child.

Crumb 2497

Haiku #40

The elder on wheels
is propelled by the young one,
advancing along.

Crumb 2498

Insult #3

Society will be much fairer when all judges, all internet moderators, all referees, all attorneys, all people who play any role in assessing the conduct, actions, or works of others are replaced with AIs whose capacities are equal among themselves.

Crumb 2499

Negation #11

Not one of his kids missed his death or attended his funeral.

Crumb 2500

Onslaught #31

Fallibility is never an acceptable criticism of any complex system.